RIS" that's just waiting for something. He calls it "runtime redirection on demand". It doesn't pay off as well as preloading it; but you save the time on loading for later. However, the problem with preloading is that if you do it for something expensive you better check you're not doing it too often or you will run out of memory. _____ I love that moment when the penny drops and the plane takes off. -- Joan Didion I have a place that's not too far from downtown. It's actually a little like downtown itself. -Image of downtown (to me) I'd like to live downtown. I've lived there before, down on the south side. It's great, but very gated community. I'd like to live in a more populated area, but of course, there are constraints. It's been nice, it's been about 94 degrees everyday, and the good ole' breeze keeps you cool. Dallas is hard as shiat when it gets this hot. That's a tough place. If you could deal with some of the crowds and lack of services then Dallas can be really nice. I go to Lakewood Ranch from Fort Lauderdale occasionally. I'd like to live there cause I can live on the lake but I stay at a hotel. I'd get my hair done and stuff and spend the days lounging around while the professionals get to work. Huh...that's not a bad idea. I live in a town that has 3 locations within 6 minutes of my house. That's a lot of civilization for this area of

TX. Anyway, I've traveled to Lakewood Ranch several times in the past and it's neat. Going to a club or a place like that can be a lot of fun if you have friends in the area. You're probably living in a place that's not nearly as nice as San Diego though. I'm sure you are. I used to live in San Diego. It was nice. The weather here in Fort is not that nice. I wouldn't mind, but I was spoiled by the weather in San Diego. I just like a splash of cooler temps when I workout. I can pretty much get any type of temp I want for workouts here in Texas. If it was 100 today, it will be 90 tomorrow and in a few hours it will probably be back down to 85. I'm Knockdown of huntingtin expression in primary cortical astrocytes: characterization of biological processes and physiological responses. Neurodegenerative diseases, such as Huntington disease, are characterized by the localized and progressive loss of neurons and glial cells, the latter being the only cells whose abnormal, permanent increase in number has been firmly established as a pathologic response. This glial reactivity is associated with the progressive deposition of aggregates of expanded polyglutamine repeat expanded protein in diseased neurons and, as a consequence, of abnormal accumulation of a misfolded self-protein that is normally internalized and degraded by the cell. Indeed, in response to protein aggregation, astrocytes and neurons increase expression of various heat shock proteins as well as chaperones and molecules involved in proteolytic degradation. Since huntingtin (HTT), the mutated protein found in Huntington disease, has all these properties, here we address the specific effect of the expression of HTT in astrocytes, regarding survival signaling, apoptosis and glial reactivity, with the application of both gain-of-function (expression of wild-type full-length protein) and loss-of-function (knockdown of the protein) experimental approaches. Our data show that HTT has a negative impact on astrocyte survival, by inhibiting STAT3 signaling (a well-known and critical survival factor in these cells), and is also implicated in abnormal increase and altered polarization of glial cells, which respond to stress by growing and incorporating extracellular matrix. This is the first study showing that HTT knockdown has a specific effect on cell survival, and thus pointing to a potential target for therapy, in a relevant and physiologically relevant primary cell type./
