The components that my test class depends on are also marked as '@Injectable'. Therefore, I cannot depend on them before the test class. Since the components which are marked as '@Injectable' cannot be mocked or injected before the test class, the question becomes, how to inject a specific component which is necessary for the test and is not available at the start of the test class? I can see the example to do it on the below link, but not sure how to do it on the scenario where component which is needed to be injected is present in the app. The scenario that I am trying to achieve is, the child component needs specific behavior. In order to test it, I need to inject the providers of that component. A: I can see two options - use a TestModule which injects all the components you're missing: @Module({ imports: [...], providers: [ {provide: X, useValue:...}, {provide: Y, useValue:...} ] }) export class TestModule { } Or your child component depends on a provider that's not already injected by any other component (that might be a bit fragile). @Component({ selector: 'child-component', template: "", providers: [ {provide: X, useValue:...}, ] }) export class Child 6d1f23a050
